

The Change we must make

In this world of varied hue,
Where people come in different view,
There's a poison that seeps through,
Social discrimination, it's true.

It starts with a word or a look,
A judgment that's made in a book,
An attitude that's based on a crook,
An idea that's already took.

The color of skin, the way we talk,
The clothes we wear, the way we walk,
The gender we have, the way we work,
The religion we hold, the way we smirk.

All these things can be a trigger,
For the heartless, for the one who's a figure.

But we must stand up, against this tide,
We must speak out, we must abide,
We must show love, and not just hide,
We must be kind, and not just let it slide.

For in the end, we're all the same,
We're all human, with a heart and a name,
We all have dreams, we all have a flame,
Let's embrace each other, and end this game.